Washington, Mar 12 : Video games may not necessarily affect academic results of children, unlike most parents perception, according to a new study.

In fact, the new research claims that video games can have a very positive influence in the education of children, when used in moderation.

ngeles Llorca Dez from the Department of Didactics of Musical, Plastic and Corporal Expression at the University of Granada, along with professors Dolores Ivarez Rodriguez (University of Granada) and ngeles Dez Snchez (University of Salamanca) aimed to investigate whether attitudes of users toward video games, and how they use them, have a significant impact on cognitive variables, specifically in spatial intelligence, self-efficacy and academic performance, acknowledging the existence of structured security measures that protect the child.

They analyzed a sample of 266 total participants aged between 11 and 16, together with their corresponding parents (fathers or mothers). All children were given a semi-structured interview, a survey of use and preferences in video games, two intelligence tests and an inventory of self-efficacy. Parents filled out a survey on opinions, knowledge and attitudes toward video games.

Results found that boys not only play more than girls, but they start earlier, an outcome that could be related to a clearly cultural influence. Also, it was observed that participants, as they play more often, they do it for longer periods of time, which in the opinion of Llorca Dez "confirms the concern of some researchers about the possibility that some video games are addicting".

There are also gender differences not only in the use that young people make of video games, but also in what they demand of them. Thus, boys are more stringent than girls, and prefer realistic, challenging, impressive and competitive games.

Regarding the variable of academic performance, the researcher points out that it is not only affected by the use of video games, but also hours of study and self-efficacy perception have demonstrated predictors of school success."

ngeles Llorca insists that video games can represent "a very useful pedagogical tool" to encourage self-efficacy, a variable that improves academic performance.

Poll

The percentage of Muslim population in India may be much more than the statistics that the Indian Government wants Indian's to believe. Without a Uniform civil code and pampered Muslim community following their own law (4 wives + 'n' number of children) do you think the Muslim population will multiply to become a majority in India?
